Dear Sir,

Since the Protection of Wild Mammals Act came to be, it has undoubtedly been exploited. Hunting associations have found loopholes in the law to allow them to continue their barbaric and bloodthirsty sports in complete disregard to the intentions of the act. The Buccleuch Hunt website even states that "all Scottish packs use the exemption allowing foxes to be flushed to guns." The sport of fox hunting is a cowardly one and in this day and age when we know that these animals feel so much fear and pain it should not be tolerated. To protect our wildlife and their habitats, it is vital that the Protection of Wild Mammals Act is Reviewed to seal any loopholes and end this Blood Sport for good.

Sincerely,
Rachel Hall
